Perfusion-enriched doses of rubidium-82 have reduced accuracy in pulmonary disease. The purpose of this study was to determine if altered pulmonary perfusion results in decreased sensitivity or accuracy when using rubidium-82 in the quantitation of pulmonary perfusion. Thirty-five male New Zealand white rabbits with surgically-induced unilateral pulmonary emboli were randomized into 7 groups: baseline, sham control, right lung emboli, right lung emboli + <sup>68</sup>Yb implant, right lung emboli + Rb-82 implant, left lung emboli, and left lung emboli + <sup>68</sup>Yb implant. Pulmonary perfusion was quantified using 48-hour-stressed-washout (S/W) scans in all limbs and with subtraction of regions of interest (ROI) in the radiopharmaceutical-free right lung. Using standard quantitative techniques, a gamma variate function was used to convert pixel values into percent injected dose per unit mass (%ID/mL). Using principle components analysis, changes in %ID/mL were then converted into %ID/100 g and %ID/kg.
