Full Version.il score either in patients who underwent PCI or in patients who did not receive PCI did not change the effect of the interaction between PCSK9 genotypes and statin use on LDL cholesterol. Given the modest number of patients in this subgroup analysis, the finding should be interpreted with caution. This study has several strengths. First, the study was large, included patients of diverse ethnicity and derived from several centers in Canada and the USA. Second, there was a comprehensive dataset available on several potential confounders of the association between PCSK9 genotypes and cardiovascular risk, including history of smoking, history of diabetes and use of anti-diabetic and anti-hypertensive medications. There are limitations to this study that should be acknowledged. First, since the study is observational, there is a potential for selection bias. However, even if patients who received a statin were more likely to receive LDL-lowering therapy, statins could also cause changes in CRP, which would bias our analysis towards the null. However, the differences between those who did and did not receive statins did not change the effect of the interaction between genotypes and statin use. Second, this study did not examine the effect of PCSK9 genotypes on atherosclerotic lesions, the primary reason why targeting PCSK9 may be important in reducing cardiovascular events. However, the associations that we observed between PCSK9 genotypes and CRP and between PCSK9 genotypes and LDL cholesterol were consistent with the effect of PCSK9 polymorphisms on statin-mediated LDL reduction. Third, the study only examined 882 CAD patients, thus, it was not possible to compare the association between genotypes of PCSK9 and clinical outcomes among patients of different subgroups, e.g. among patients on different statin regimens. Fourth, this study included prevalent cases of CAD, and thus, was not able to examine the effect of PCSK9 polymorphisms on incident cases of cardiovascular events. Finally, although there is no plausible mechanism to explain how PCSK9 genotypes might modify the association between statin therapy and clinical outcomes, multiple proteins have been suggested to 50b96ab0b6
